Health Tips by Terri L. Scott, MSN, CRNP-F

Are you easy to talk to you? Are you a good listener? Open communication is essential for a healthy home life. This topic is important for emotional stability and growth.

Did you know that most adolescents who are bonded with an adult who is involved in their well-being is less likely to engage in risky behaviors?

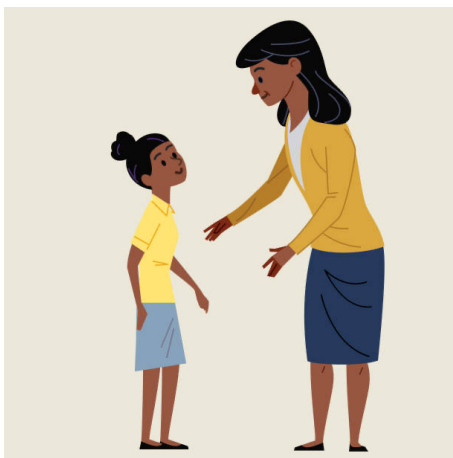

Parents, did you know that being involved and promoting activities in the lives of adolescents help them to learn to explore and engage in new ventures?

Did you also know that health behaviors in childhood are dominated by parental instruction and shared family values?

How can we communicate better and become more involved?

1. LISTEN. Parents, sit quietly and let your child express themselves without interruption.
2. PAY ATTENTION. Parents and children, make time for conversations or activities where you and your child have uninterrupted time together.
3. HAVE PATIENCE. Agree to disagree and remain calm with all interactions. Promote positive understanding and limit conflict. Seek help and support if communication is failing.

Our children learn by what they see and hear, let's set a positive example and be good mentors!
